The Evolution of a Dome

Tucked within 4.5 private wooded acres, this remarkable home began as an ambitious dome framework in the early 1980s—a personal challenge in engineering and imagination by nuclear engineer Jim Perkins. Its protective shell stood quietly among the trees for years, awaiting the right hands to bring the vision to life.

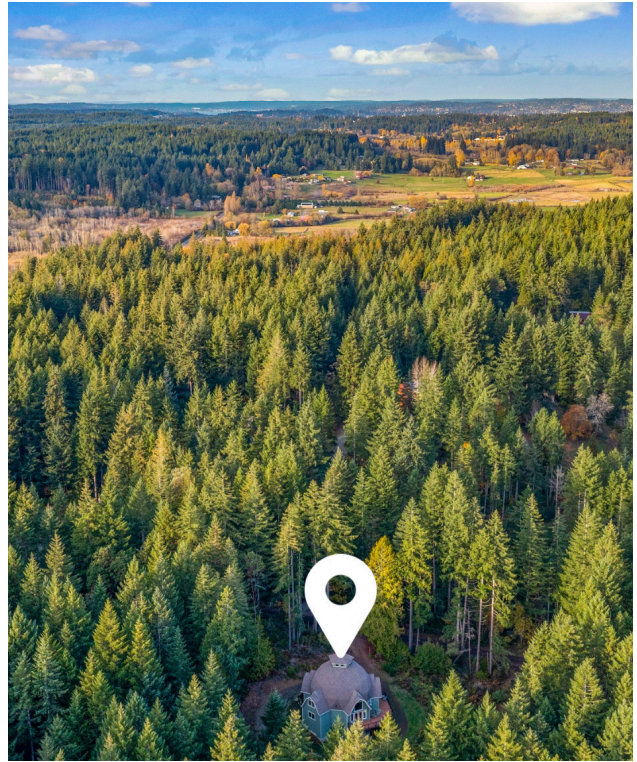

In 2005, its next steward, Bryn Schueler, arrived—not simply to finish a house, but to honor and elevate a dream. Over the next decade, with patience, artistry, and craftsmanship, the structure transformed into a breathtaking three-tiered retreat: a soaring 60-foot dome with cloisonné-patterned woodwork, honeycomb inlays, five gabled dormers, and a stunning Italian spiral staircase ascending to the 10-window cupola above.

What once was a shell is now a sculptural living space—a blend of engineering ingenuity, handcrafted details, natural materials, and a serene forest setting. A home shaped thoughtfully over time, where artistry meets livable comfort and longevity, inviting its next chapter. Featured in Residential Reincarnation: Western Washington — Volume One, this one-of-a-kind residence stands as a testament to vision carried across generations, realized with devotion and skill.
